last month, Cook County passed an ordinance requiring employers to provide eligible employees with certain paid sick leave benefits. The ordinance largely mirrors a recent amendment to the Chicago Minimum Wage Ordinance, which was passed in July. Both are scheduled to take effect on January 1, 2017, and a new Illinois law pertaining to sick pay benefits is set to take effect on Jan. 1. Cook County’s ordinance applies to employees throughout the county except where a home-rule municipality has passed its own sick leave law. So far, Chicago is the only home-rule municipality to have done so, although some other cities have expressed an intent to potentially opt out of the ordinance. In addition to these two new ordinances, the state has passed a law that extends sick pay benefits to family members of employees. Here’s what you should know about these new laws: Cook County and Chicago
Who qualifies for paid sick leave?
Employees are eligible for paid sick leave if they work at least two hours in a two-week period while physically present in the geographic boundaries of the city of Chicago and/or Cook County, and work at least 80 hours in any 120-day period.
Who is a covered employer?
A covered employer includes individuals and companies with a place of business in Cook County or Chicago that employ more than one individual. Cook County’s ordinance excludes government entities and American Indian tribes from the paid sick leave requirement, and employees covered by collective bargaining agreements are able to waive the requirements in their contracts.
Chicago’s definition of “employee,” which references the Illinois Minimum Wage Law, excludes five types of employees from paid sick leave coverage: agricultural employees, outside salespersons, members of religious corporations or organizations, students at an Illinois college or university who are covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act and employees of motor carriers. Both ordinances exclude construction workers subject to collective bargaining agreements.
• How many hours are employees permitted to accrue and at what rate?
Employees accrue paid sick leave beginning either on the first calendar day after commencement of their employment or on July 1, 2017, whichever is later. Paid sick leave accrues at the rate of one hour for every 40 hours worked. Employees can accrue and use up to 40 hours of paid sick leave per 12-month period. Employees may be required to wait 180 calendar days following the start of their employment before they are able to use any accrued leave.
• For what purposes can an employer use paid sick leave?
An employee can use paid sick leave (1) for his or her own or a family member’s illness, injury, medical care, treatment, diagnosis or preventive medical care; (2) if the employee or a family member is the victim of domestic violence; (3) if the employee is absent for more than three consecutive work days, then an employer can require documentation signed by a licensed medical provider that the paid sick leave was used in accordance with the law. An employer cannot require the documentation to specify the nature of the injury, illness or condition, except as required by law.
• Can an employer require a doctor’s note?
If the employee is absent for more than three consecutive work days, then an employer can require documentation signed by a licensed medical provider that the paid sick leave was used in accordance with the law. An employer cannot require the documentation to specify the nature of the injury, illness or condition, except as required by law. Employers are hopeful that implementing regulations and guidelines will clarify some unknowns in the new laws, such as whether employees will be entitled to reinstatement of paid sick leave if they leave employment but return within a specified period.
Chicago, Cook County and Illinois are just a few of the many state and local governments across the country that have passed paid sick leave laws in recent years. Connecticut passed the first paid sick leave law in 2011. Since then, more than 30 states, municipalities and counties have enacted versions of paid sick leave laws.
Employers should carefully review their policies related to paid sick leave to ensure compliance with the new laws. Employers with employees outside of Illinois should determine whether they need to amend their sick leave policies to ensure they are in compliance with state, municipal and county paid sick leave laws being enacted around the country.
